SATURDAY, MARCH 6, 1869.

The Cabinet.

The long suspense is over at last, and the country has found that the first official act of the new President is in strict compliance with the promises given by him. Until the very last moment the names of the Cabinet were as profound a mystery as they were three months ago. It is true that nearly every name in the list as finally announced has been mentioned in connection with a Cabinet appointment, but it is quite as true that a score of others were equally prominent in the same connection, and not until the official promulgation of the appointments was there the slightest approach to certainty in the case of any one of them, with the single exception of General Schofield, who simply holds over in the War Office for a short period and for a specific purpose.

The first thing which strikes the reader in looking over the list is the fact that the professional politicians have been practically ignored and defied. Said the Chevalier McClure in his recent interview with the President, "The Republican party will not be satisfied with the appointment of some of the gentlemen who have been mentioned; such men, for instance, as George H. Stuart and Adolph E. Borie." At the time this oracular saying was made, in common with nearly every independent Republican journal of the State, and with the great mass of the party, we protested against it, feeling that President Grant would pay no more attention to the brazen assurance of McClure than it deserved. The appointment by him of one of the very men whom McClure saw fit to proscribe, shows that the people have not made a mistake in the man whom they have elevated to the highest position within their gift. Secretary Borie is as nearly as possible the direct opposite, the positive antithesis, of a demagogue. He has never before held a public office, has never been engaged in any of the small plots and petty intrigues which are the staple wares in the business followed by the class of men of whom McClure may be taken as an example. During the whole of his long career he has been engaged in mercantile pursuits of an extended character, in the successful prosecution of which the only qualities that are desirable are directly the reverse of those which are so prominent in the composition of men of the McClure type. For this reason the professional politicians may expect no favors at the hands of the new Secretary of the Navy, and in an equal degree the professional plunderers of the public treasury and the whole horde of incompetent parasites who subsist upon the body politic may anticipate no mercy. It is not to be presumed that Secretary Borie will, at this late day, transfigure his character and the business habits of a lifetime, for their especial benefit. Hence, while his appointment to the head of the Navy Department will be received by the professionals as the signal of their doom as far as his influence and patronage are concerned, it will be hailed with satisfaction by the great mass of the people, on whom fall the heavy burdens of taxation and from whose substance are extracted the spoils of office in which the professionals are accustomed to revel.

What is true concerning Secretary Borie is equally true concerning Secretary Stewart, whose business pursuits have of late years been conducted on the most gigantic scale. Mr. Washburne, who goes into the State Department, is a man of a different type, a life-long politician, but a pronounced and indefatigable enemy of the great army of public plunderers—in short, a statesman of enlarged views and ripe experience, who will be thoroughly in sympathy with Borie and Stewart in all the efforts which they may make towards securing an honest and competent administration of the affairs of the Government, from Secretary Cox, of the Interior Department, and Postmaster-General Creswell, the country is fairly entitled to expect as much as from the other appointments. They have both enjoyed considerable experience in public life, but to neither of them can be applied, with any regard to truth, the reproach of having made politics a trade. The new Attorney-General is less known than his colleagues, but all accounts which come to us represent him as being a jurist of deep and varied learning, of large experience, and of unimpeachable integrity. The War Department will remain for a time under the control of General Schofield, according to previous announcement by the President, who hopes, through his agency, to effect certain desirable reforms which would be retarded, if not defeated, by a change at present. Secretary Schofield has administered the affairs of his office in a manner which has given entire satisfaction to the country, and his indefinite continuance in the War Office will meet with approval on all sides.

Such is the Cabinet which General Grant has called around him, a body of men possessing, in an eminent degree, the qualities of head and heart which are indispensable to honest, economy, and reform in governmental affairs. If the President discovers that he has made a serious mistake in his selections, we have his solemn pledge that he will not hesitate a moment in effecting a change. With this assurance in mind, the people of the country have already sanctioned the action of the Senate in promptly ratifying the nominations; and are now settled down in the conviction that the administration of President Grant will witness a thorough reformation in the details of the Government by a practical and successful inauguration of the principles of economy and retrenchment, so long ignored, and with such disastrous results.

Lieutenant-General Philip H. Sheridan. PRESIDENT GRANT yesterday nominated Lieutenant-General W. T. Sherman for the office of General of the United States Army, which has just been made vacant by his own elevation to the Presidency, and Major-General Philip H. Sheridan was named for Lieutenant-General, and Brigadier-General J. M. Schofield to succeed Sheridan as Major-General. The most significant of these nominations was that of Sheridan. The promotion of Lieutenant-General Sherman was expected, and it was a fitting recognition of his eminent genius and military services, and it was also thought that Secretary of War Schofield would be advanced to a Major-Generalship on the first vacancy. Sheridan, however, was not the senior Major-General, and his nomination by President Grant and his prompt confirmation by the Senate as Lieutenant-General is not merely a personal compliment and a recognition of his brilliant services during the Rebellion, but it is an emphatic endorsement of his course at New Orleans, by which he incurred the displeasure of the late President Johnson. Sheridan, when in command at New Orleans, knew but one line of duty—to enforce the laws of Congress in letter and spirit, and to make those laws both respected and obeyed by the Rebels who were endeavoring to stop the progress of reconstruction. As a matter of course, he incurred the displeasure of Andrew Johnson, and was supplanted by a more pliant instrument, who was willing to uphold the Johnsonian policy, and Sheridan was sent out to the Plains to fight the Indians—a rough, unpleasant, and vexatious field of duty as the vindictiveness of Johnson could find for him. His campaign against the savages, however, has been so successful that Grant has declared it will be impossible to recall him at present, and what Andrew Johnson intended for a punishment and disgrace has resulted in adding fresh laurels to those which the most brilliant cavalry general of the war has already won.

The prompt endorsement of all these nominations by the Senate is gratifying, but it was particularly so in the case of Sheridan, who has fairly won the proud position of Lieutenant-General, an office that has hitherto been filled only by Washington, Scott, Grant, and Sherman.

Bismark's Congratulations. It is a significant fact that the only congratulatory messages that were received from Europe by the cable at President Grant's inauguration came from Prussia. The Berlin Chamber of Commerce sent their good wishes, and Count von Bismark, the Prussian Prime Minister, said briefly, but to the point: "My cordial congratulations on this solemn occasion." There is no country in Europe where the United States Government and people are better understood and appreciated than in Prussia. Many of our most valuable citizens are Prussians by birth, and in that country the most unbounded admiration is felt and expressed for the life, services, and character of Abraham Lincoln. Bismark is himself the first European statesman of the age; he has succeeded in raising Prussia to the position of a first-class power, and he has successfully disputed with Napoleon for the position of "arbiter of Europe." He knows well that the American people have now a man in the Presidential chair who will promote the safety, honor, and welfare of his own country, and who will deal with foreign powers in a fair and straightforward manner, without any diplomatic quibbling. What he means he will say, and what he says he will do. The value of these congratulations consists in their evident cordiality and sincerity, and as spontaneous expressions of true and hearty good will they will be appreciated by President Grant and the American people.
